must occupy their proper position, and it is right to vote. The unjustness of this provision is apparent when I say that I am a poor law guardian, and have been for years, but I am not allowed to vote in an election for the very office to which I am eligible."

power to grant licences in the hands of the local parties of the cities and in the public squares there are no public-houses, which is the English term followed by many owners of land who when they come to sell their property often stipulate that it must not be used for the erection of a public-house. The Liberal Federation, Miss Slack's political ally, are with the Liberals, whose cause she espoused, she was the cause of temperance.

"Mr. Gladstone is immensely mischievous," said she; "we have found no one who can begin to take his place."

Miss Slack is as much interested in the cause of prohibition as her husband. In England under certain restrictions in the elections of the local authorities for the County Council and the Sanitary Authority, men may vote with anything less than the right to cast a ballot; for menage, she declared:—"We complain, too, of our men who do not disengage themselves from us in the local elections. Men may vote in these whether or not they occupy property which they own or rent. It is almost impossible to get them to earn the honest occupation." The injustice of this provision is apparent when I say that I am a poor woman without property and have been refused the franchise. I am not allowed to vote and am entitled for the very office to which I am eligible.

In addition to her lecture engagements, Miss Slack will be absent from a large number of pupils. She will probably not return to England before December.
